Why Using Eco-Friendly Household Cleaning Products Do Matter

The motivation behind using eco-friendly household cleaning products is more than just caring for our Mother Earth. More often than not, most people turn to using eco-friendly household cleaning products is because them and/or their loved ones are suffering from allergies, with eczema being the most common example. Compared to adults, young infants and children are much more vulnerable to the harmful effects of chemical pollutants as they are growing and developing rapidly.

The foods that we eat (especially processed foods), homes, work places, and even the air that we breathe in are sources of toxic chemical contamination. In fact, our home is one of the top sources of many toxic chemicals:

- Household products like detergents and the various cleaning agents for glass, wood, metal, ovens and toilets may contain hazardous chemicals such as ammonia, sulfuric and phosphoric acids and formaldehyde. When not properly handled, these products can make the home environment a dangerous place, especially for young children.
- Home furnishings, such as carpets, curtains and some furniture, may be treated with potentially-dangerous chemicals that contain volatile organic compounds which may be emitted into the air.
- Some play sets and toys may be treated with toxic chemicals, are made from toxic plastics, or include hazardous materials. The more time these children spend playing with them, the higher their exposure to toxic chemicals, therefore, the greater a risk these toys are to their health.

Common negative side effects that can result from toxic chemical exposure, include breaking out into rashes, dizziness, migraines and eye, skin, and respiratory tract irritation (including asthma). Plus some of these chemical agents may be harmful when inhaled or ingested accidentally.
